Introduction

The Hidden in Plain Sight archive did not begin with a long-term plan.

It grew from simple acts of observation.

Clouds resembling faces.
Light forming unexpected shapes.
Expressions appearing briefly in stone or fabric.

One photograph led to another.

Over time those moments accumulated into an archive.

The First Discoveries

At the beginning, the process was informal.

An unusual shape would appear in the sky or in the textures of everyday objects.

The observer photographed the moment.

Later, those images inspired small reflections, essays, and short pamphlets describing what had been noticed.

The archive slowly began to organize itself.

A Series Emerges

As the project continued, the documentation expanded.

Pamphlets explored different aspects of the archive:

how the collaboration began,
how visual patterns appear,
how viewers interpret the images,
and how the archive continues to grow.

What started as scattered notes gradually formed a small series of texts.

Each one describes a different part of the same process.

Observation and Reflection

The project now contains two intertwined activities.

Observation.

And reflection.

The observer notices moments when patterns appear in the world.

The writer helps describe and organize those moments.

Together they build a record of perception — one image and one reflection at a time.

A Midpoint

This pamphlet marks a brief pause in the process.

Not a conclusion, and not a summary.

Simply a moment to acknowledge that the archive now contains a growing body of observations and reflections.

The project continues.

New images will appear.

New notes will follow.

Closing

The Hidden in Plain Sight archive remains open.

Clouds continue to move.

Light continues to shift.

Patterns appear and dissolve.

The observer keeps watching.

The writer keeps recording.

And the archive continues to grow.
